As Black History Month wrapped up, we want to highlight Destiny Hodges, the founder of Generation Green, a Black youth-led and multi-issue organization. Hodges is a junior interdisciplinary communication major at Howard University from Birmingham, Alabama.

Her goal is to educate and uplift by telling stories of marginalized communities, especially the Black community. Hodges uses the media as a form of narrative organizing to tell how the community is effected by the issues of environmental justice.

The mission of Generation Green is engaging the African diaspora by internationally connecting and uplifting the work of young, Black environmental leaders. The nonprofit also serves as an inspiration for others, a space for sharing strategies and solutions, and draws parallels between Black communities internationally that are disproportionately impacted by environmental inequities exacerbated by climate change.
